Third: Course Description

This course is designed to introduce Comparative Literature to students as an interdisciplinary field of study that explores literary texts across borders. The course familiarizes students with the different schools of Comparative Literature, such as the French and the American schools. It also traces the development of this field of study over time to embrace a wider scope that not only focuses on the West as a center of knowledge, but rather extends its horizon to include other literatures of the world, such as the Japanese, Chinese, Caribbean and Arabic literature, among others. The course attempts to clarify the idea that the terms Comparative Literature and World literature are synonymous. It, therefore, presents literary texts from different parts of the world to be scrutinized and compared diachronically and synchronically, not only also explores the connections between literary texts and other fields of study and forms of art. Thus, a particular attention will be paid to the different adaptations of the texts, as well as their different readings in different epistemological levels. thematically and stylistically, but also regarding their translations. The course also explores the connections between literary texts and other fields of study and forms of art. Thus, a particular attention will be paid to the different adaptations of the texts, as well as their different readings in different epistemological levels.
